

More and more students with disabilities are taking on the challenge of education and training after high school, and succeeding. This workshop has been prepared to help disabled students of all ages who are thinking about continuing their education after high school. It is based on the services offered to students with disabilities in postsecondary education, and contains practical suggestions to assist in managing the daily challenges that arise as they continue their education.

Postsecondary education is any education beyond high school. It includes trades or business schools, vocational-technical schools, colleges, universities, and continuing education programs. The ideas in this workshop apply to students of all ages: those in high school preparing for graduation and those who have left before graduation and now want to continue learning.

Whether students plan to enroll in a full time academic program or a single course of training, this workshop will help students assemble their ideas necessary to make the most of their opportunities.
